Within Photoshop, use of the History panel is very helpful. If you're used to working with different programs, Adobe makes it easy to go back to the previous states of an image just by using the History panel.

Afterward, in the Batch Processing dialog box, the option to Automatically Adjust Tones is selected. When Automatically Adjust Tones is selected, Photoshop creates the first level for the image to be adjusted, all the way to the final state. The option is set at the default of Filled, which is the option selected for this example. Choose the setting that works best for your image. Photoshop provides easy controls for setting the values of the different toning steps. For this image, the steps are set to Zero, one, two, and three. * Level zero is the default setting. * Level one uses the highest amount of contrast. * Level two is similar to level one but doesn't saturate the image as much. * Level three is similar to level two but saturates the image more. Moving to the Curves dialog box, as shown in Figure 4-2, click the Add button to add color fills to the painting and adjust the color. Figure 4-2: Click the Add button and choose Fill from the list in the Curves dialog box. Photoshop gives you four presets to choose from in the Curves dialog box: Curves, Intensify Colors, Deepen Blacks, and Sharpen. Choose the settings that best match your image. The default settings for Curves is shown in Figure 4-3. The settings for Intensify Colors is shown in Figure 4-4. Even though it's a good idea to set the default of a curve to zero, setting the default of the curves to one is a good idea as well. The curve is not as intense as the previous one. That is, if the image has some haze or dust, the default setting might not eliminate it very much. Figure 4-3: Here, the default settings are used for the Curves dialog box. Figure 4-4: Here, the default settings are used for the Curves dialog box. If you want to apply a more dramatic curve to the colors, you can do so manually by dragging the default curve upward or downward. After you've finished, you can save the settings by clicking OK.

Request.GetQueryString vs Request.QueryString I can't seem to understand the difference between Request.GetQueryString() and Request.QueryString. The first seems to have a base calling GetValue() on the current route. I can't imagine that would be a problem, as people in the past have said GetQueryString just calls the QueryString of the Request. But someone else said it was there for backwards compatibility. And he wasn't wrong. That's what this article says. But the article didn't explain what gets called on the base HttpContext.Current.Request. Can someone tell me what is actually different? Do I really need to add just the correct namespace to the QueryString if I call HttpContext.Current.Request.QueryString or am I safe calling it? A: The first is used if you want to map an action (a method on a Controller) and use the QueryString, if you use Then the Action will look in the QueryString, if
