Continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) has been the ventilation mode of choice for years. However, respiratory support in pediatric patients in the Intensive Care Unit (ICU) should also include high-frequency oscillatory ventilation (HFOV) due to its safety and efficiency in the treatment of severe acute respiratory distress syndrome (ARDS), its lower impact on oxygenation than conventional ventilation, its advantages in preventing lung damage, and the use of lower pressures and frequencies. However, HFOV may also be used for acute respiratory failure (ARF) and in non-ARDS settings, with similar results as CPAP. The ventilatory mode may influence the respiratory rate, the tidal volume and the respiratory rate and peak pressure. Furthermore, the type of high-frequency devices (HFV) and its use is also significant. Ventilatory modes should be individualized according to the needs and preferences of the patient. Thus, HFOV is the ventilatory mode of choice when mechanical ventilation is required in a patient with severe ARDS

Welcome to the town of Saitama, where Witches live with peace and harmony. And there is a little orphan boy, Rabi-Ribi, who is simply the cutest kid ever. He can transform himself into any of the 3 witches...and any of their allies! But when he got betrayed by a witch, Rabi-Ribi became a little mad. Rabi-Ribi's anger is driving away the Witches, but a single good hearted person called GemaYue will try to revive the Witches... "Rabi-Ribi's rebirth! It's not over until it's over!" This is not my first post on the subject of video works. On March 6, 2010, I posted an article on the art of "Letting Go." But today I'm coming back to video as a medium, partly because of a stunning performance by Ranjit Chowdhury. Ranjit Chowdhury was born in the UK but grew up in Nigeria, where his father was the prime minister of the Federation of Nigeria. He currently lives in New York and is an important sculptor and film artist. We have met a few times at Whitney's or Connews, and I've seen his intriguing film about the Achebe books, but have never spoken face to face. Until today. Chowdhury has developed a new kind of performance art, made very entertaining by his easygoing in-your-face candor and infectiously energetic body language. He devised a dramatic physical take on the gestures and gestures (mostly hand gestures) he uses in his modern-day African pidgin version of the Ebonics language, which he uses in his stage performances. He was clearly working off a script, probably approved by the artist that commissioned it, which is not unusual in the contemporary art world. Since we were at Connews, I asked him why he used a script. For the first reason, he said, he doesn't read the script he uses. Because he doesn't want to be in the way. "I don't want to be over your shoulder," he said. The second reason is, when the artist gives you the script, you've lost the key to the performance and you're simply part of the context, not the focus, which gives the work a kind of fragile quality.
